TERMINAL DEVICE AND RECEIVED DATA DISPLAY METHOD

INTL CLASS: G06F-017/60

ABSTRACT

PROBLEM TO BE SOLVED: To easily select commodities which are most suitable as gifts for each gift recipients by displaying information on commodities while taking the gift recipients into consideration.

SOLUTION: A commodity information reception part 103 extracts commodity information including attribute information from a received signal and is then able to obtain recipient information, commodity field information, and adequacy information included in the attribute information. A storage part 104 stores personal information as information showing features of predetermined gift recipients such as "birthday", "sex", and "age". A commodity information selection part 105 determines whether some of features of the recipient of recipient information matches features of gift recipients of the person information and arranges the commodity information so that commodity information including corresponding recipient information is at the head when there are matching features in the recipient information. A data display part 106 displays the commodity information in the arranged order.

ABSTRACT

PROBLEM TO BE SOLVED: To provide a gift mediating method convenient and economical for the sender, the receiver and the seller of the gift.

SOLUTION: A sender relating control part 54 to receive a gift order from a sender side client 101 installed at the gift sender side, and a receiver relating control part 55 to provide information of the gift order to the receiver side client 301 installed on the receiver side of the gift are provided. The receiver relating control part 55 receives the change of the gift from the receiver side client 301 based on the information of the gift order, and information about gift change history relating to the receiver is stored in a gift change controlling database 130. The sender relating control part 54 provides the gift change history information to the sender side client 101 when ordering the gift.

Alerting Abstract JP A

NOVELTY - A memory (2b) stores merchandise information of shop. The search unit (2a) searches appropriate shop where the user requested goods is sold out, based on user's present position and goods information received from user's personal digital assistant (PDA) (3). The optimal acquisition channel information generated based on received information is transmitted and displayed as map on PDA to explain goods position.

DESCRIPTION - INDEPENDENT CLAIMS are also included for the following:

- 1.goods position presentation system;
- 2.route planning service provision method; and
- 3.route planing service provision program.

USE - For acquisition of route displaying present position of shop and goods, according to user's request.

ADVANTAGE - The optimal acquisition channel information displayed as map on user's PDA, enables presentation of route to shop, to user easily.

DESCRIPTION OF DRAWINGS - The figure shows the block diagram of the acquisition route planning service provision device. (Drawing includes non-English language text).

- 1 acquisition route planning service provision device
- 2a search unit
- 2b memory
- 2c receiver
- 2f transmitter

Abstract: A compact air shower array to observe primary cosmic rays above a few TeV has been installed at Mt. Chacaltaya in Bolivia since 1996. This array is available to observe the air showers above 6 TeV and the longitudinal development curves above 50 TeV. The purpose of the observations is to study the chemical composition and the energy spectrum of cosmic rays in the energy region including the "knee" of the energy spectrum. First, the consistency between direct measurements (balloon-borne experiments) and air shower observations in the energy region from 50 TeV to 80 TeV is examined and confirmed. Next, the chemical composition and the energy spectrum are derived from the air shower observations. In the study, the longitudinal developments of shower particles are calculated by Monte Carlo simulations, assuming different chemical compositions above 80 TeV. The characteristics of the present air shower array and the comparison of the preliminary observed results with that of the simulations are presented. (14 Refs)

Original Abstracts:

A method and system providing a secure system for purchasing goods or services from a gift provider over a network, such as the Internet, is disclosed . A gift giver purchases the goods or services for a gift recipient , wherein an encrypted key is generated for the transaction. Portions of the encrypted key are divided between the gift recipient and the gift giver , with a third party (e.g., the gift provider) holding the entire key and decryption tools. After delivery of a gift card to the gift recipient , communication between the gift giver and the gift recipient must be made to recombine the portions of the encrypted key. Upon submitting the complete key to the gift provider , the gift card is redeemed/activated giving it a monetary value or access to the goods and...

Claims:

What is claimed is: b 1 /b . A method of providing a secure gift -giving transaction via an electronic storefront of a merchant between a gift giver and a gift recipient , comprising: receiving a gift order placed by the gift giver via the electronic storefront of the merchant; generating at least first and second encrypted key portions ; transmitting gift order information containing said gift order and said second key portion to a gift provider ; sending said second key portion to the gift recipient ; receiving by said merchant from said gift recipient said second key portions , and combining said key portions to fulfill said gift order.

The server SV receives the offer and sends the giver an invoice. Registry of the recipient and issuance of the password for the giver ensure the safe gift service of desired items via the network...

...Generally, a gift such as a wedding gift hardly reflects the desire of a receiver of the gift . There has been conventionally no gift system through which the desire of the receiver of a gift matches with the intention of the presenter . According to the invention, the system has a server (SV) including a storage unit (34) where data concerning gift is stored; the receiver connects a first terminal (80) to the server (SV), conducts registration, selects a commodity as a gift that the receiver expects to receive, and registers it; a password for allowing an access to the web site where merchandise is registered is distributed to prospective presenters ; a presenter connects a second terminal (90) to the server (SV) by means of the password, specifies a commodity that the presenter wants to present the commodity, and applies to present it; and the server (SV) sends, upon receiving the application, a form for payment. Since the receiver is registered and a password for presenter is made, a desired commodity is presented safely and reliably through a network...

TERMINAL DEVICE AND RECEIVED DATA DISPLAY METHOD

ABSTRACT

PROBLEM TO BE SOLVED: To easily select commodities which are most suitable as gifts for each gift recipients by displaying information on commodities while taking the gift recipients into consideration.

SOLUTION: A commodity information reception part 103 extracts commodity information including attribute information from a received signal and is then able to obtain recipient information, commodity field information, and adequacy information included in the attribute information. A storage part 104 stores personal information as information showing features of predetermined gift recipients such as "birthday", "sex", and "age". A commodity information selection part 105 determines whether some of features of the recipient of recipient information matches features of gift recipients of the person information and arranges the commodity information so that commodity information including corresponding recipient information is at the head when there are matching features in the recipient information. A data display part 106 displays the commodity information in the arranged order.

GIFT MEDIATING METHOD AND COMPUTER-READABLE RECORDING MEDIUM RECORDED WITH GIFT MEDIATING PROGRAM

INTL CLASS: G06F-017/60

ABSTRACT

PROBLEM TO BE SOLVED: To provide a gift mediating method convenient and economical for the sender, the receiver and the seller of the gift.
SOLUTION: A sender relating control part 54 to receive a gift order from a sender side client 101 installed at the gift sender side, and a receiver relating control part 55 to provide information of the gift order to the receiver side client 301 installed on the receiver side of the gift are provided. The receiver relating control part 55 receives the change of the gift from the receiver side client 301 based on the information of the gift order, and information about gift change history relating to the receiver is stored in a gift change controlling database 130. The sender relating control part 54 provides the gift change history information to the sender side client 101 when ordering the gift.

 GUILT: FACING ITS AMBIGUITIES IN THE CHRISTIAN LIFE (FORGIVENESS, GRACE, SELF-ACCEPTANCE)

This dissertation advances the thesis that the Christian solution to guilt is different from those commonly proposed in psychology, and suggests ways in which the Christian capacity for constructive guilt and its resolution may be fostered.

Part One offers a phenomenological description of guilt, and distinguishes it from shame and depression. Humanistic, existential and psychoanalytic interpretations of guilt are then presented. Because these schools eschew objective criteria (moral-religious values), the psychological resolution of guilt tends to be a solitary affair. Questions concerning the other, forgiveness and grace are not raised. In essence, psychological solutions to guilt focus typically on restoring self-esteem, either by lowering one's expectations or working harder at self-realization. In examining guilt from a Christian perspective, Christ's call to make a loving gift of self to God and others is the central focus. Constructive guilt is understood as a corollary of a maturing conscience, and is appreciated insofar as it signals a failure in self-giving love. Ultimately, the Christian solution to guilt is grounded in the reality of God's merciful love, and is realized experientially through a healing dialogue with Christ.

Employing the anthropology of the Christian vocation developed by Rulla, Ridick and Imoda, Part Two examines the conditions necessary for implementing the Christian solution to guilt. This section focuses on the dialectical tension which exists between the Christian's conscious desire to respond to Gospel values, and resistances to the cost of self-giving love which may be manifest through conscious sin, unconscious inconsistencies or psychological conflicts--and hence, different types of guilt experiences.

Part Three proposes ways in which guilt may be transformed gradually into a progressive symbolic experience in the Christian life. A systems theory view of the dialogical self, complementary relationships, and change provides insights for dealing constructively with moral-religious failure. Christian schooling of the moral affects (empathy, guilt and shame) is also critical. Lastly, the capacity to accept oneself in Christ is aided by an understanding of the Law of Gradualness, and guilt may be resolved in a timely fashion by applying the transcendental precepts (Be Attentive! Be Intelligent! Be Reasonable! Be Responsible!) to experiences of self-dissatisfaction in a life of on-going intellectual, moral and religious conversion.

This narrative ethnography explores the value of Buddhist consciousness of death, kamma, and the gift, by following the transformation in Thailand from a political order based in the global, military-gift economy of the cold war to the liberal free-market exchange of a "new world." At key moments in the transformation, the Thai military has massacred unarmed citizens in Bangkok streets. As actors struggle to harness the unstable symbolic power of corpses in public culture, the meaning of death becomes increasingly subject to the political economy that shapes mass media. While benefitting from both the sensational value of violent death and from the powerful argument for liberal freedoms which military massacres provide, the new order does not acknowledge the sacrifice of the demonstrators for its sake. Their death is divested of value, in part because of the flattening and anaesthetizing effect that mechanical reproduction has when representing violence, but ultimately because the form of political economy that may be gaining ascendance in Thailand is a cultural system inherently immune to symbolic exchange with the dead. The dissertation then explores alternatives to this economy of forgetting. Buddhist meditative visualizations of corpses, like mass media, seize upon gory detail as a powerful source of value, and yet the economy of the "charnel ground" meditation can avoid anaesthetizing effects. Never-the-less, the parallels between the image-realms of Buddhist meditation and media experience suggest that the utopian hopes some theorists have placed in mechanical reproduction are not unfounded, but unrealized. The problem of public memory that jettisons the dead is ultimately one of alternate cultural-economic realities in Thailand, and can be critically understood through a Buddhist consciousness of mind-body, and of the kamma haunting capitalist politics. The dissertation concludes by describing how rural villagers bring an ur-form of free-market capitalism, the casino, into the household funeral, where Buddhist consciousness of kamma, within a complex of family, economic, societal, political, and historical relations, provides fertile ground for a critique of political economy and for further development of the anthropological theory of the gift .

Earlier workers on Pakistani migrants in Britain have assumed that many features of migrants' culture and social organization will disappear as they assimilate British values, or have regarded the Pakistanis' non-assimilation as problematic. By contrast, this thesis argues that the Pakistani migrant community, although disadvantaged in relation to the host society, possesses social and cultural institutions which, far from disappearing, are well-adapted to life in Britain. Some quantitative data are presented, but the thesis rests mainly on ethnographic data from informal interviews and from participant observation among Pakistani families in Oxford and Pakistan, for this reveals aspects of migrants' attitudes to life in Britain and of their social organization which would otherwise be concealed. The first part of the thesis examines the extent to which external influences, including the political and economic background of the migration and the socio-economic conditions in which migrants are now living, have influenced the present structure of the Oxford Pakistani community. I argue that migrants are more in control of their environment than has previously been recognized. They belong to a society in which migration has been a tradition for over a century and there is little evidence that the migration to Britain has made any more impact on their social institutions than previous movements within the Indian subcontinent. The second part examines the stability of these social institutions and shows that the community's social organization is more complex than is often thought, and more able to cope with life in Britain. Kinship groups are not rigid. Ties created through social exchange and gift - giving, in which women play a crucial role, permit new links with non-kin to develop and provide an important source of support. Moreover, people are not only bound by ties of kinship or social exchange , but by the ideologies of 'community' and religion, important influences over people's activities. Similar conclusions may apply to other Pakistani communities and to other south Asian groups in Britain.

This dissertation presents the thematic foundation of the church as a family of families as a theology of parish life for Community Covenant Church of Omaha. Theologically, the church is seen as an all encompassing family of brothers and sisters (Mark 3:33-35) joined and knit together by its head Jesus Christ (Ephesians 4:15-16). This concept of Christian "sibialism" relies upon systems theory, a non-Cartesian methodology and an ecological orientation. Systems theory elevates relationships that connect people and make them more than the sum total of their parts. Non-Cartesian methodology emphasizes the whole that exists when relationships occur rather than the separate individuals within the relationships. The ecological orientation emphasizes familial-like relationships existing within the religious nested structures of church and denomination and the secular structures of community and region.

Thematically, a case is made that sibialism is the one permanent relationship that believers have. Although conjugal, consanguine and consensual relationships are seemingly more tangible (and appropriate recipients of ministry), such relationships are in fact provisional in structure, penultimate in status and transitory in character. All such relationships will end and it is only sibialism that will endure. Christian sibialism is viewed as being eschatological in origin, transcendent in scope, covenantal in nature and inclusive in purpose.

Such sibialism is worked out in the field of ministry of Community Covenant Church and its environs in Omaha. It begins its sequential manifestation through worship where the family shares its Eucharistic meal. Here all are made equal in this sacred time of communitas and all are instructed and empowered to reach out in service to others. As Jesus invites all to his meal of grace and to his family, so too does Community Covenant and it uses the gifts it has at its disposal--marriage and family ministries--to do so. Such ministries are offered to the community at large with the dual purpose of strengthening existing relationships and restoring disrupted relationships. The final goal of ministry is fellowship which is carried out in its deepest dimension through small groups.

THE EARLY MISSISSAUGA TREATY PROCESS 1781-1819 IN HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE

The history of the Mississauga treaty process in Upper Canada has been written in part by other authors. This thesis is the first attempt to write a comprehensive ethnohistorical account of early treaties between the British and Mississauga, and place them within their historical context. Two new arguments are presented to re-evaluate both British and Mississauga participation in the treaties. In the case of British participation, a dichotomy of interest developed after 1792 in Upper Canada. Imperial considerations, as represented by the Indian Department, focused on trade and military factors, while colonial aspirations, as represented by Lieutenant Governor Simcoe, envisioned the acquisition of Indian land for settlement. Resulting tension threw the seven treaties enacted between 1781 and 1788 into confusion. None of these treaties had followed Royal Proclamation of 1763 or subsequent gubernatorial instructions on Indian land surrenders and consequently no good title could be proven on behalf of the province of Upper Canada. On closer examination these treaties look more like agreements of peace and friendship than land transactions, which would be consistent with earlier Indian Department behaviour with the tribes.

This is also consistent with traditional tribal treaty behaviour. The Mississauga had been involved in indigenous treaty relations before the arrival of Europeans. Traditional treaties normally dealt with trade and alliance issues and were couched within gift exchange ceremonialism. The institute of gift exchange raised hospitality and presents to a level symbolic of solemn promise and agreement. Indian Department intentions to secure trade and alliance agreements with the tribes fit this pattern well and tribal ceremonialism was readily adopted. An understanding developed across the cultural barrier. However, when the same process was later used in the early nineteenth century with the intention of securing land title in the mode of private property, the tribes completely misunderstood the intent. The result was the wholesale acquisition on the part of the province of Upper Canada, of four million acres of land within two years for paltry consideration.

These two new insights into the treaty process combine to effect an entire reappraisal of British Indian relations during the colonial period.

THE POETIC WORKS OF CLAUDIO RODRIGUEZ (SPANISH LITERATURE, POETRY, TWENTIETH-CENTURY)

Author: HODGSON, IRENE BELLE

Claudio Rodr(')iguez is one of a group of Spanish poets who grew up in postwar Spain and began to write during the 1950's. Because his poetry and articles on it have been difficult to obtain both in and outside of Spain, and because many of the articles on that poetry are reviews or relatively brief columns in literary publications, Rodr(')iguez's poetry has received little systematic or comprehensive study. The first task was to accumulate, order and evaluate the materials to arrive at a history of the studies of Claudio Rodr(')iguez's poetry. The present study includes all four of his books, focusing on major themes and stylistic techniques in each of the books.

Don de la ebriedad describes a mystical gift of sight, a metaphor for poetic vision. The speaker exults in that vision and describes an inverted mystical process of purification necessary to become worthy of it. The poet's responsibility is to give of himself fully through his poetry as nature does, and he laments his inability to do so. Conjuros shares the theme of giving; the speaker reveals those barriers which block man from achieving the kind of giving present in nature. Rodr(')iguez presents human society as one of hostility and deceit, in reaction to the tense atmosphere in which he grew up. Human society is separated from the land (i.e., nature) and its apparent harmony and brotherhood is superficial. In Alianza y condena, Rodr(')iguez contrasts the positive and negative aspects of reality, accepting both as parts of human experience. El vuelo de la celebracion, like the first book, is a celebration of life; however, both the poet and the speaker have matured and continue to sing even in the face of death. Imagery is most important in Rodr(')iguez's poetry; he presents scenes on a specific, concrete level, then raises them to a universal level, largely through the special use of adjectives, contrasting the two levels and the two sides of reality.

What is a Market? On the Methodology of a Contested Concept.

... manner currently en vogue in economics.

III. TOWARDS A DEFINITION OF THE MARKET

In the present section I shall discuss which forms of exchange should count as market exchange , given the above criteria . Subsections 1 and 2 focus on a number of formal criteria of market exchange . Subsection 3, by contrast, deals with competition as a necessary expression of the impersonal nature of market exchange , and hence focuses on the main motivation underlying market exchange as opposed to other forms of exchange . The discussion will proceed by contrasting the market with five alternative social forms, namely firms and organizations, central planning, bargaining, casual exchange , and the exchange of gifts . For a summary of the discussion see Table 1.

1. Voluntary and Specified Exchange

...common. with the noted exception of the Austrian approach (but see Shand 1984, who includes exchange), they all consider exchange to be the hallmark of a market. In fact, markets are regarded in some cases as nothing but exchange. Note however that it is not exchange per se, but voluntary and specified exchange that, for the methodological reasons outlined above, can qualify as market exchange and that can hence be analyzed as a stylised fact. To see why it is not exchange as such, let me explain what I mean by "voluntary and specified exchange". For exchange to be specified, it is not necessary that the two parts of the exchange take place simultaneously. Indeed, many exchanges stretch over an extensive period of time. Rather, specificity means that the mutual agreement on the exchange includes a substantive specification of both parts of the transaction. The criterion thus excludes forms of exchange (e.g. the exchange of gifts) where the specificity of the exchange is not given in substantive terms because the transaction is based on (at most) the...analyze the (implicit) price. Specificity is therefore an epistemological precondition for the economic analysis of exchange.

At first sight, the condition of specificity would seem to exclude experience goods from the...

...what they are going to exchange.

The last remark indicates that there are forms of exchange where some components of the exchange are well specified, e.g. working hours and wage in a labor contract, while others...

...and timing of compensation is specified at least in part, these exchanges are not merely gifts. But they also differ from the discrete exchange framework which dominates neoclassical economics and which is sometimes even assumed in heterodox approaches. This framework presupposes not only that the exchange is disembedded from social relations (in the sense that the identity of transacting partners is...

...aggregation of quantities, because agents cannot tell in advance what exactly they are going to exchange and whether two exchange acts concern truly the same commodity. For the economist, this means that the focus of the analysis has to shift from the content of the exchange (price and quantity) and those factors which determine the content (supply, demand, income, technology etc.) to its form, i.e. to an analysis of those aspects of the exchange which have been formalized and those which have been knowingly left open or contingent upon...

... addressed as "Mr." or "Mrs." To confuse the two is a great insult.

Customs concerning gift giving are extremely important to understand. In some cultures gifts are expected and failure to present them is considered an insult, whereas in other countries offering a gift is considered offensive. Business executives also need to know when to present gifts --on the initial visit or afterwards; where to present gifts --in public or private; what type of gift to present; what color it should be; and how many to present.

Gift giving is an important part of doing business in Japan, where gifts are usually exchanged at the first meeting. In sharp contrast, gifts are rarely exchanged in Germany and are usually not appropriate. Gift giving is not a normal custom in Belgium or the United Kingdom either, although in both countries, flowers are a suitable gift when invited to someone's home.

Customs concerning the exchange of business cards vary, too...

... said. "You mustn't give the appearance of doing anything wrong. . . . People who give things like that expect things in return." The city Ethics Board did urge Goode to issue an executive order banning city officials from accepting certain kinds of gifts , board chairman Gregory M. Harvey recalled yesterday. Goode did so in 1988.
